When we got back to Pandeli's, the ship captain was already there. The two of them were sipping little cups of syrupy coffee. Pandeli introduced us and then, leaving Rita, I took Michali to the second floor where the waiter ceased laying crockery on the tables and left us alone to talk.

Michali told me he was "interested" when I showed him one gold piece and said twenty-eight more would follow if we could arrange convenient terms. He looked reflexively at the coin, fingered its weight, laboriously calculated its worth in terms of paper lira. Then he asked if my journey would in any way prevent his normal commercial efforts along the route. Quite the contrary, I replied. And the destination? So far as I was concerned, I told him, Cyprus. After that, it was entirely up to him.

Again he reflected. "They need large pots in Famagusta," he observed, "large pots for their wine; I have a cargo of enormous earthenware from Samsun. Yes, I can make a deal."

"You wish to start when? This very night? Well, so be it. I can load. And your own papers? You can handle those affairs? And the woman? She is not coming with us? No, of course I shall not tell her. But that is a task I do not envy you."

I handed the skipper four more gold pieces and asked him to take me to his boat and confirm what he had told me of its size, seaworthiness, the condition of its sail and Swedish engine. He introduced me as Georgios to his crew of three. One of them was a deaf-mute. I thought: so much the better, a smaller percentage of potential blabbers. I told Michali I would come aboard at sundown – with only two sacks as baggage. He asked no questions.

By the time we finished our arrangements and returned to the restaurant, it had started to fill. All the customers were men. Pandeli was in the middle, waving his shirt-sleeved arms, wiping his hands from time to time on a dirty apron. The mustachioed little Greek was an absolute tyrant; he immediately ordered each client to his place. The favored guests, friends, were seated below, along lengthy tables set parallel to the white walls of the small room. Those for whom he had no special regard were shepherded upstairs by a waiter.

Pandeli – called Cobanoglu only by the police – was equally despotic with the meal. You ate what you were given. You dared not even ask for salt or pepper. It was assumed that every dish was perfectly seasoned.
